Los Angeles Asian Pacific Film Festival 2008: BItes for Your Video Bus

Miriam Kane, San Francisco Examiner

The rise of the documentary film has been a major trend in the last few years. Often, these films are controversial, raising questions about social and political issues. The 2008 Los Angeles Asian Pacific Film Festival is no exception. The festival, which runs from April 11 to 20, showcases a range of films, including documentaries, that address various social and political issues. One of the highlights of the festival is "Bites for Your Video Bus," a documentary that explores the issue of hunger in Los Angeles.

The documentary follows several individuals who work to combat hunger in the community. Through interviews and footage, the film highlights the stories of those affected by hunger, as well as the organizations that provide support. The film also features a discussion with a group of experts on the topic of hunger, including a food bank director, a social worker, and a nutritionist. The experts provide insight into the root causes of hunger and the importance of addressing this issue.

The documentary aims to raise awareness about the issue of hunger and to inspire action. It encourages viewers to consider ways they can contribute to the fight against hunger, whether through volunteering, donating, or simply spreading awareness.

In conclusion, "Bites for Your Video Bus" is a powerful and thought-provoking documentary that sheds light on an important social issue. It is a must-watch for anyone interested in understanding the complexity of hunger and the actions we can take to address it. The film is a testament to the power of documentary filmmaking in raising awareness and inspiring change.

This year's festival promises to be one of the most exciting yet. With a diverse range of films and events, there is something for everyone to enjoy. Be sure to check out "Bites for Your Video Bus" and the rest of the festival offerings.
